On Friday December 7, the Center for Media at Risk hosted "Symposium Spotlights Political Cartoonists at Risk." The event was a panel discussion that featured eight individuals—journalists and researchers—discussing their experiences with censorship and harassment as political cartoonists.

The discussion highlighted the challenges faced by cartoonists in the United States and around the world, particularly in the context of white supremacy. The panelists shared their experiences and insights on how white supremacy should be treated by the media.

The panelists also discussed the role of media organizations in protecting cartoonists and the importance of free speech. The event was an opportunity for the panelists to share their experiences and challenges, as well as to receive support and encouragement from their peers.

The Center for Media at Risk is committed to advocating for media freedom and supporting journalists who work in challenging environments. The organization focuses on providing resources, training, and support to media professionals around the world.

The event was attended by a diverse group of individuals, including media professionals, scholars, and activists. The discussion was an important moment in the ongoing efforts to support media freedom and protect journalists who work in challenging environments.
